High blood pressure is also a major cause of erectile dysfunction. A study published in the Journal of Urology in 2000 showed that 68 of men with high blood pressure aged 40-79 experienced erectile dysfunction at one time or another. At least 45 of these cases were considered severe erectile dysfunction.

Erectile dysfunction occurs because high blood pressure keeps the arteries that carry blood to the penis to dilate. This causes the smooth muscles in the penis to reduce its ability to relax, leading to inadequate blood flow to the penis that hinders the erection of the penis. In addition, high blood pressure in men may lead to low testosterone level.
